

10 International Pop Artists You Should Know

BY SARAH CASCONI FEBRUARY 20, 2016

When most people think of Pop art, the big names come to mind: Andy Warhol, Roy Lichtenstein, and Jasper Johns. The Walker Art Center in Minneapolis reminded the art world that the genre is actually a much larger phenomenon with its critically-acclaimed 2015 exhibition, “International Pop.” As the show travels to the Philadelphia Museum of Art, opening on February 24, here are 10 under-appreciated masters of the field whose work you can see in the show.

Sorry About That (1966)

3. Rosalyn Drexler (1926–)

This Rosalyn Drexler work, with its subject matter and dramatic contrast, recalls Robert Longo’s classic “Men in the Cities” photographs of men in suits, but was painted by the American artist over a decade earlier.
